Course/Module description:

This course seeks to introduce students to a number of new and interesting issues currently under discussion in the field of International Relations and the adjacent fields to it. The course will examine new methods to the study of international relations and raise a series of case studies, examples, and issues implementing these methods. The aim of the course is to allow students an introduction to some ideas, approaches and research that are not necessarily mainstream. The course aimed to allow thinking that, to me, is more creative in international studies, and open up students to studies in fields that are challenging and innovative in international relations today.

The course will be comprised of three parts - in the first part, we will discuss under my guidance examples of innovation and research in international relations. In the second part, we will invite faculty and graduate students of the Department of International Relations who will tell us about their research. In the third part, the course students will present their work.

Course/Module aims:

Allow creative and groundbreaking thinking in the field of international politics

Learning outcomes - On successful completion of this module, students should be able to:

Meet some new approaches and concepts for the Study of international relations, understand the challenges faced by creative thinking about international politics, and present innovative research in international politics
