Course/Module description:

In August 1947, after decades of anti-colonial national struggle, the British raj in India came to an end. India's independence, which initiated the decolonization of Asia and Africa, was accompanied by a territorial partition into two nation-states—India and Pakistan. This course examines the intersection between the three major historical processes that reshaped South Asia in the second half of the twentieth century: decolonization, partition, and cold war. What were the origins of the rivalry between India and Pakistan, and how this rivalry was integrated into the global power struggle of the cold war? To what extent did the superpowers manage to strengthen their influence in the region? How did the leaders of the new states interpret the Cold War and the contrasting socio-economic models of the two blocks? What role did anti-colonial sentiments play in shaping non-alignment? We'll discuss these issues while focusing on specific events and processes, such as the internationalization of the Kashmir conflict, the Indo-Pakistan wars, Bandung Conference, the economic Five-Year plans in India, the Sino-Indian war, and the Bangladesh war of independence.
