Course/Module description:

The Mediterranean as a geographical region, a cultural space, an economic unit, and an object of fantasy and imagination constitutes a foundational pillar of European, African, and Middle Eastern cultures and histories. From antiquity to the twenty-first century, intellectuals, writers, artists, and philosophers tried to capture and define what makes the Mediterranean unique, and thereby produced universal insights about human history and the human condition. In this course we examine some of the canonical works about the Mediterranean and Mediterranean culture, and discuss themes such as Mediterranean trade, multiculturalism, and colonialism. In addition, in each class we will learn about different historiographical theories and methodologies and examine how historians applied them in writing the history of the Mediterranean.

Course/Module aims:

*Master the broad corpus of canonical texts from the period.
Describe the content of different sources.
Analyze texts as products of social, historical, and political contexts.
