Course/Module description:

In this course, we will discuss the major transformations that have occurred in the Chinese media landscape as a result of economic reforms, commercialization processes and the introduction of new technologies. How has the launching of market reforms and the "Open Door" policy transformed the structure of China's media industry, and how did these developments affect the relationship between media producers and the socialist Party-state? How did commercialization and globalization impact media production and consumption in China? What role does Chinese media play in the global media market, and how does the Internet affect the relationship between society and the state in China? We will address these and other issues by drawing on readings in the field of media and communication studies, cultural studies, politics, sociology and anthropology of China, as well on class discussion of selected Chinese media products.

Course/Module aims:

- Review the main objectives and contents of the Chinese government's media policy in recent decades*
- Provide participants with an understanding of the key factors shaping the production, distribution and consumption processes of various media products in China, including: TV, news press, magazines, websites, and online video games*
- Examine the relationship between the media industry, business entities, and the Party-state in contemporary China*
- Discuss the characteristics of Chinese Internet culture and the implications of the rise of the Internet on everyday practices and social activism in contemporary China*
- Examine the impact of the Internet on the traditional media in China and the governing strategies of the Chinese Party state*
- Foster participants' ability to exercise critical thinking and analysis of key issues in Chinese media research*
