Course/Module description:

According the democratic ideal, elections influence the composition and working of central state institutions. In this course, we survey if and how this ideal translates into practice in contemporary Germany. We begin with an overview of the political system in general, the machinations of the electoral system as well as the standard theoretical framework of how elections are supposed to realize democracy in parliamentary regimes. Subsequently, the course introduces the main approaches to explaining voting behavior and election outcomes, paying particular attention to continuities and change over time as well as divergences between East and West. In the final part of the course, we go over the main institutions of the federal republic and analyze how elections and public opinion shape their functioning and action.

Course/Module aims:

The course aims to give students a theoretically-motivated overview of the German political system. Rather than looking at the different institutions in isolation, the approach focuses on the dynamics and connections that arise from the democratic aspirations of the system. It will enable students to gauge exactly how elections exert influence over politics, familiarizing them with associated scholarly debates and intellectual conundrums along the way.

Learning outcomes - On successful completion of this module, students should be able to:

- describe the central institutions in the German political system,
- analyze the determinants of elections and draw out their implications for the composition and functioning of said institutions,
- and relate these dynamics to theories of system performance and democratic government.
