Course/Module description:

The modern French Republic is often seen as a civic nation-state and as the defender of universal human rights. French laws have been written in a universalist language that presumably reflects these values. Yet a gender analysis of the development of law and legal culture in modern France reveals that gender assumptions, arguments, and beliefs restricted republican universalist ideology and incorporated into French law gender, sexual, ethnic, and religious inequalities. This course will examine the deep connections between questions of gender and sexuality and questions of law and citizenship in France from the nineteenth to twenty-first centuries. We will explore topics such as the place of women in French nationality law, the influence of notions of gender on the development of the French welfare state, the gender premises of French colonial law, the public debate about the "Islamic" veil and its influence on France's "secular" legislation, debates about laws concerning IVF, and debates about same-sex marriage.
