Course/Module description:

The protest movement of 1968 had an important impact on the West German society. Then mostly joint by students the protests are today interpreted as a turning point towards more democracy and political participation. But what was the context of these protests? What happened in East Germany? How was it possible that parts of the protest movement transformed their political strategy into terrorism? The course aims to review the protest movement of 1968, its terrorist aftermath, the impact it had on the German society and the memories of protest and terrorism.

Course/Module aims:

The course will provide a complex understanding of German protest movements during the 1960s and 1970s within a transnational and transgenerational perspective. Its aim is to review the historical events within its contemporary context and additionally from a present perspective. Ways of understanding and commemorating protest and terrorism in Germany are intended to develop a historiography of German terrorism.

Learning outcomes - On successful completion of this module, students should be able to:

- analyze and understand a historical phenomenon such as protest and terrorism within its contemporary context (sources)
- apply methodological and theoretical concepts to a historical phenomenon
- reflect commemoration and memory politics added to a historical event
