Course/Module description:

This course aims to examine the conditions of the Mediterranean basin as an area for the regional integration of the State of Israel and thus Israel's insertion in the international system. In current world politics, countries use their participation in regions and regionalism as a "steppingstone" towards the process of globalization, which bridges the local and international levels. In doing so, the region provides the nation-states with a way to gradually establish contact with the world while maintaining the communal/particularistic qualities.

During the course we will refer to several dimensions of the Mediterranean Basin region and Israel's role in it (among them geopolitics, economy, identity, internal political system, history and diplomacy), which are in constant competition. We will also get to know the regionalist projects that have been promoted in the Mediterranean basin in recent decades and analyze them based on theoretical frameworks of regional integration, while comparing them to parallel subregional processes in Europe, the Middle East and Africa. Finally, we will deal with the many regional and international cooperation projects in which Israel participates and discuss the various opportunities and risk of the "Mediterranean option" for the future of the State of Israel.

Course/Module aims:

- To encourage research on regional and sub-regional integration processes in the Mediterranean basin.*
- To develop thinking about the importance of the region and participation in regional projects for the State of Israel.*
- To provide students with theoretical, methodological and empirical tools for analyzing Israel's role in the region, and in the Mediterranean basin in particular.*
