Course/Module description:
The course traces the intricate visual dialogues between polytheists, Jews, Samaritans, Christians and Muslims in the eastern Mediterranean in Late Antiquity. The traces of these encounters are found not only in historical and literary texts, but also in architecture and art. In a multi-cultural society, different religious groups share a common mental and physical space, yet, at the same time, they all strive to define their separate identities. In ancient societies, where few were literate, art played an important role as a means of proliferation and amplification of the religious experience, as an instrument of political propaganda and as a tool for the promotion of social agendas. Works of art are historical documents that sometimes confirm what we know from written sources, and at other times, make us aware that the picture is complex or different from what we supposed. The course examines both the intimate links, as well as the disjunctions, between art and text.

Course/Module aims:
a. The course uses a body of literature that is interdisciplinary (art history, archaeology and history, Judaic and Christian studies) and aims to encourage students to cross the boundaries of their discipline.
b. To advance the students' academic skills to deal with methodological aspects relating to the connection between text and visual imagery in Late Antiquity.
c. Using contrasting texts to each subject will provide an opportunity to engage in critical discussion.
