Course/Module description:

This course is about the international relations of the Middle East. As such, it will discuss the core strategic interests driving the local and foreign actors currently taking part in the reshaping our region, and the increasing rivalry between the Sunni states and the Iranian-led "axis of resistance." The course will provide a panoramic view of the shifting geopolitical landscape and security environment in the region in a historical and contemporary context, exploring the emergence and breakdown of regional alliances and shifts in the balance of power. The course will try to assess the shape the Middle East will have taken when the dust finally settles on the ongoing crises ravaging the region.

Course/Module aims:

This class will analyze the Middle East through a theoretical, historical and contemporary lens, and provide tools for understanding the International Relations in the region

Learning outcomes - On successful completion of this module, students should be able to:

Analyze the International Relations of the Middle East

Demonstrate the applicability of IR theory to the region

Explain the core interests driving the various powers shaping the Middle East

Compare between the historical and current motivations of the primary movers and shakers in the region

Attendance requirements(%):

100%
