Course/Module description:

This course will delve into the theme of massacres and Genocide in modern European history. The course will chronically explore acts of massacre from the second half of the nineteenth century and until the end of the twentieth century. These genocides were either conducted in Europe, in direct involvement with European affairs or by a European power outside Europe. The course will begin with the Early Armenian Massacre of 1894-7 that was directly linked to the balance of power between the Great European Powers, through the German Genocide of the Herero and Nama in Namibia, the Turkish Genocide of the Armenians during WWI, the Holocaust and will conclude with the atrocities of the 1990s in Bosnia. In addition to the accounts of these different genocidal events, the course will explore conceptual, ethical and theoretical questions concerning mass killings. How do we define these similar and yet different events and the terms that describe them? What motives and reasons could explain these genocidal events and how did and should the international community respond to these?
